This article delves into the significance of "I Write What I Like," exploring its historical context, key themes, and lasting impact on South African society and beyond.

Historical Context of "I Write What I Like"

Steve Biko was born on December 18, 1946, in King William's Town, South Africa. As a medical student, he became involved in student politics and eventually co-founded the South African Students' Organization (SASO) in 1968, promoting black consciousness. Biko's activism was rooted in the belief that the liberation of black South Africans would not only be a political struggle but also a psychological one.

The book "I Write What I Like" emerged during a time of intense racial discrimination and oppression in South Africa. The apartheid regime, which began in 1948, institutionalized racial segregation and disenfranchised the majority black population.
